WILL MAKE SPAIN WINCE

New Ambassador Arrives From Russia With a Bouquet For Uncle Sam.

COLDNESS OF NEGLECT

Will Cause Spain to Squirm Uneasily and Banish the Last Hope of Intervention—Casini Says Russia Loves America.

Washington, June 22.—The new Russian ambassador, Count Cassini, will be formally received by President McKinley in a day or two. The coming of the ambassador at this time when Europe is keenly alert to the progress of the war excites more than ordinary interest, for it is known that he brings a message of the warmest good will on the part of the Russian government and one making it quite evident that the existing friendship between Russia and the United States will not be shaken by the events of the war. He comes from a distinguished family and his diplomatic services have made him an influential factor in government circles at St. Petersburg. His last post was at Pekin, where he was in charge through the serious complication of Germany's occupation of Korea. When he arrived at the Russian embassy, the ambassador expressed his satisfaction at having the opportunity of renewing at this juncture the cordial sentiments which have so long existed in Russia toward the United States. He said he was authorized to give this sentiment the fullest and most positive expression. The sympathies between the two countries have become traditional, he said, and at no time was the feeling more hearty than at present. When Count Cassini was asked if the Russian people and press shared the feeling of the Russian government, he answered that the people thoroughly shared in it. As to the press, however, he said that its power for good had been developed in Russia and there was no established rule by which a newspaper was looked upon as a powerful exponent of public opinion. One Russian newspaper, having a Jewish editor, has published an article very unfavorable to the United States, which the ambassador understood had received rather serious attention in this country as an evidence that Russia was not entirely unfriendly. But this paper, Count Cassini said, expressed only the views of its editor and was without standing with the government, or authority to express its views. As a matter of fact, the publication was directly contrary to the attitude of Russia toward the United States. As showing how little the Russian press voice the sentiments of the Russian government, the ambassador said that despite the extremely warm relations between Russia and France, some of these publications frequently asserted that France and Russia were at serious odds. Count Cassini was asked whether Russia looked with apprehension upon the American occupation of the Philippine Islands. He replied that Russia was naturally deeply concerned in any movement affecting the great problem of the far east. The Philippines, were, to some extent, a part or outpost of the far east, and who was to control them, if they passed out of the control of Spain, was of interest and importance to Russia, but so far as Russia herself was concerned, Count Cassini said that her sphere of activity was confined to the far east proper, and not to the Philippines and other outlying islands, which could have only an indirect and remote influence in the development of the east.

In response to an inquiry as to whether Russia was likely, alone or with other powers, to look with disfavor upon the control of the Philippines by the United States, the ambassador said that he did not apprehend any change in the present good relations between the United States and Russia. He added, however, that it seemed to be quite undesirable that the possession of the Philippine Islands should pass into the hands of England, as that would seriously disturb the equilibrium in the far east.

BEAUTIFUL CUBAN SPY.
Boston, Mass., June 22.—At the Adams house is a beautiful Cuban girl, whose life story is so romantic as to make the experience of Evangelina Cisneros seem commonplace. Rosa Maso is her name, and she came to this country four months ago, having escaped from Havana to some place on the Florida coast, by means of a sailing vessel belonging to a friend.

And she has reason to be gratified for that escape, for, according to her story, she had been for months following the virtual occupation of an spy, carrying dispatches between the Cuban leaders, and never hesitating to go into town garbed in the Spanish. If it served her purpose. Finally she came under surveillance in Havana, and would doubtless have been hanged or shot in short order had she not taken French leave as she put it, and escaped to this country. She had, however, been rescued by a man, who, having reached a haven of safety, escorted Maso to not satisfied but expressing a determination to return to Cuba, if possible, as a scout or dispatch bearer in the service of Uncle Sam.

She says she has already made written application to President McKinley, and will within a few days try to secure an interview with him to urge her fitness for the service, as she is thoroughly familiar with sections of the western part of Cuba. No man could ever reasonably ask to see a more lovely picture of femininity than Rosa Maso presented last evening.

The seniority appears to be 15 or 20 years of age, and talks of the excitement of her army life with the enthusiasm of youth but in rather broken English. When asked what could possibly impel her to risk her neck by going to Cuba again, she reminds the questioner that her father's murder is yet to be avenged—that she is a dead shot, and although she does not know the murderer's name, she saw his face and could, if necessary, pick him out of a thousand.

She is petite and slender, and has the most perfect type of opulent Cuban beauty—features of classic mould, eyes of entrancing depth and brilliancy, and luxuriant black hair worn something after the style of "La Merced"—although without the severe and rather monotonous simplicity affected by the Parisian fashion. Her gown, of the most fashionable cut, was of the richest silks and beautiful coloring.

Here are some of the facts regarding her life, as related last evening by herself: She was born near the city of Pinar del Rio, in the west part of Cuba, where her father owned a tobacco and sugar plantation that made him a wealthy and influential citizen.

Although a non-combatant, he had a son in the Cuban army. The young man, whose name was Valentin, was killed about two years ago.

Because of his son's service in the cause of his native land, or for some other reason, the Spaniards entered a grudge against the family, and one day a familiar with present history of Cuba knows what that means.

It meant that early one morning the old man was called from his bed by a party of Spanish soldiers, and when he went to the door he was stabbed to the heart by the officer in charge of them.

The house was then set on fire and the poor girl, now a defenseless orphan, her mother having died some years before, and her only surviving brother being far from home, fled to the nearest insurgent camp, where she joined a little corps of army nurses.

While thus officiating as a ministering angel, she came across a dying soldier, who had a bullet in his breast, in the vicinity of his heart.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

York presents more discouragements to longevity than war in Cuba. One may be killed often and in a greater variety of styles between Chatham Square and Cooper Union than he could in the Cuban war. "Regarding it as a safe enterprise," says Eugene Lewis, "I traveled therefore of General Valderama (at whose hotel I lived in Havana) to accompany him on one of his expeditions. He saw no objection, and on an off day I went down the road with the Spanish regiment. A few miles out of Jaruco the soldiers left the train and presently flushed a few insurgents in the bush and chased them so far in the country that by the time of the afternoon session either the idea of a rest had to be abandoned and a hurry trip made to the railway station or else it was necessary to forego the return to Havana and go into camp for the night."

Valderama, the division commander, looks like a German brautsmier. He is of ample girth, and his face shines like a new sun. He has an easy-going soul, although an undoubted warrior. He preferred the Passie hotel and the comfort of his headquarters therein to a night in the open, but would listen to no proposition that would involve the giving up of his afternoon siesta. The camp was made on a sugar hacienda—or where one had existed prior to the war. All the buildings had been burned except a little stone house with a single room that had formerly known use as an office. This Valderama designated as his headquarters. No insurgents were seen in the afternoon, and not until nearly midnight did they render account of themselves.

The better part of the camp had been asleep some hours when the general was disturbed by the tumultuous incoming of two of his staff. They were young officers and ambitions of decorations. "General," they exclaimed with one voice, "the insurgents are at our outposts; they dare us to do them battle. Shall we call to arms?"

"What time is it?" asked the yawning commander. "Eleven o'clock." "It is too late for engagement." "But the rebel pigs have taunted and reviled us. They dare us to mix up with them," argued the young officers. "Tell them we will fight them at daylight," and Valderama turned over in his bed and fell asleep.

The lieutenant again came to the stone hut. "The insurgents, when we gave them your message, further mocked us and said we were afraid to meet them in battle," the aide urged. "They fear us most insultingly and taunt us with cowardice. Tell them we will go forth and kill the dogs!"

"Tell them again I will not break my word written on my hand of steel. Bid them rest content until morning; then I will arise and kill or disperse them to their utmost satisfaction."

"But," replied the aide, "they refuse to wait. They will fight now or not at all. We have justly represented your views to them without effect. They are obstinate and will not listen to reason."

"I have concluded and would rest," said Valderama, with some dignity. "My decision cannot be shaken." "Dear general," insisted one of the lieutenants—his name was Mrs. Valderama's nephew and takes liberties with his chief—"dear general, if you do not wish to engage them for the very proper reasons that you give, will you not permit us to take part of the troops and go forth. It is a scandal that these dogs and sons of dogs should taunt and cast reproaches upon us and not suffer death."

"Officers," replied Valderama, as sternly and with as much dignity as is compatible with the condition of a fat man who is trying to support himself on his elbow in a hammock, "officers, go to your tents. There shall be no battles with insurgents fought by my command in which I do not take part. If there is glory to be won, I am heretofore."

The boys retired sadly and the insurgents continued to insult the outposts until the clock in the morning. When the reveille sounded the rebels were far in the woods. They had made good their threat that they would please no Spanish officer by waiting until daylight to fight.

HANGED AT ST. LOUIS.
Murderer Dies for Shooting a Young Girl.
St. Louis, June 22.—John Thomas, who was hanged in the city jail at 4:15 a. m. He was strangled to death. The crime for which he died was the shooting of his sweetheart, Annie Rausch, aged 19, on April 6, 1897. Her lover was a white, irresponsible sort of a fellow, while she was thrifty. He refused to marry her and because of her refusal he shot her.

UNFOUGHT BATTLE OF JARUCO.
Washington, June 22.—As an instance of the Spanish style of warfare, the following is an account of the battle of Jaruco, which was not fought. Jaruco is a small town between Havana and Matanzas. The insurgents occupied near the town, the formation of the country being such that hiding places are readily found. The section was the favorite hunting grounds of the Spanish when it really became necessary to make a demonstration against the rebels. From some consideration of the subject based on study of statistics, one is easily convinced that residence in New
